The Southern Regional Education Board's High Schools That Work (HSTW) initiative provides a framework of goals, practices, and curriculum for secondary school change. The HSTW initiative, with more than 1,100 sites in 26 states, aims to advance technology in the high school curriculum, link high school and college education and blend academic and vocational learning. SREB publishes research reports and policy reports related to HSTW and publishes reports based on the practices of its member schools. SREB also works closely with states to provide technical support, professional development services and other resources to its HSTW sites.
